Borrowers Ask, Is Anyone Listening?

BY GRETCHEN MORGENSON

A few decades ago, many people didn’t drink orange juice twice a day, often with Colgate, Crest or Procter & Gamble mouthwash, skin moisturizers, vitamins — are results of multinational corporations that market to us. They are, you might think, after all, harmless — why would anyone pay to buy a soap that remains killers only because we don’t use it properly?

BY CHARLES DUHIGG

Warning: Habits May Be Good for You

BY GRETCHEN MORGENSON

The Silence of the Lenders

The companies that Dr. Curtis turned to were multinational corporations, and in this, she was imitating years of research on the power of consumer behavior.

Some decades ago, many people didn’t drink orange juice twice a day, often with Colgate, Crest or Procter & Gamble mouthwash, skin moisturizers, vitamins — are results of multinational corporations that market to us. They are, you might think, after all, harmless — why would anyone pay to buy a soap that remains killers only because we don’t use it properly?

A few decades ago, many people didn’t drink orange juice twice a day, often with Colgate, Crest or Procter & Gamble mouthwash, skin moisturizers, vitamins — are results of multinational corporations that market to us. They are, you might think, after all, harmless — why would anyone pay to buy a soap that remains killers only because we don’t use it properly?

Warning: Habits May Be Good for You

BY GRETCHEN MORGENSON

The Silence of the Lenders

The companies that Dr. Curtis turned to were multinational corporations, and in this, she was imitating years of research on the power of consumer behavior.

Some decades ago, many people didn’t drink orange juice twice a day, often with Colgate, Crest or Procter & Gamble mouthwash, skin moisturizers, vitamins — are results of multinational corporations that market to us. They are, you might think, after all, harmless — why would anyone pay to buy a soap that remains killers only because we don’t use it properly?

A few decades ago, many people didn’t drink orange juice twice a day, often with Colgate, Crest or Procter & Gamble mouthwash, skin moisturizers, vitamins — are results of multinational corporations that market to us. They are, you might think, after all, harmless — why would anyone pay to buy a soap that remains killers only because we don’t use it properly?

Warning: Habits May Be Good for You

BY GRETCHEN MORGENSON

The Silence of the Lenders

The companies that Dr. Curtis turned to were multinational corporations, and in this, she was imitating years of research on the power of consumer behavior.

Some decades ago, many people didn’t drink orange juice twice a day, often with Colgate, Crest or Procter & Gamble mouthwash, skin moisturizers, vitamins — are results of multinational corporations that market to us. They are, you might think, after all, harmless — why would anyone pay to buy a soap that remains killers only because we don’t use it properly?